

Contributors

Eileen Boris, Professor of History at Howard University in Washington, D.C., is the author of Art and Labor: Ruskin, Morris, and the Craftsman Ideal in America (1986) and Home to Work: Motherhood and the Politics of Industrial Homework in the United States (1994), which received the 1995 Philip Taft Prize in Labor History. Her current work explores issues of race, gender, and rights from WWII to the present, focusing on fair employment and equal pay in terms of racialized cultural notions of womanhood and manhood.

Fitzhugh Brundage has written Lynching in the New South: Virginia and Georgia, 1880-1930 (1993), A Socialist Utopia in the New South: The Ruskin Colonies of Tennessee and Georgia, 1894-1901 (1996), and edited and contributed to Under Sentence of Death: Essays on Lynching in the American South (1997). He is an Associate Professor at the University of Florida.

Anthony Chase is a graduate of the History Department at the University of Wisconsin and is a Professor of law at Nova Southeastern Law Center in Fort Lauderdale, Florida. He has written periodical essays for Radical America and Monthly Review, as well as law journals. His book, Law and History, will be published later this year by the New Press. He can be reached at NSU Law Center, fax: (954) 262-3835; phone: (954) 262-6152.

Corey Dolgon is an Assistant Professor of American Studies at the Friends World Program, Southampton College Long Island University. He is also a political activist and community organizer on issues of poverty and social justice. His work includes forthcoming articles on cultural studies, the relationships between postfordism, postmodernism and bourgeois culture, and the role that local political action groups can take in combatting the rise of global capitalism.

Jeff Hornstein is a doctoral student in American history at the University of Maryland at College Park, and serves on the editorial board of the Maryland Historian. His dissertation research focuses on the transformation of American middle-class subjectivity in the 1920s-40s.

Carolyn Kay is an Assistant Professor of history at Trent University, who received her doctorate from Yale University in 1994. Her primary interest is German cultural history, particularly the relationship between politics and art, and she is currently preparing a manuscript for the University of Toronto Press on modernist culture in fin-de-siecle Hamburg.

Eric Lott teaches in the Department of English at the University of Virginia, specializing in cultural studies.

Sean Purdy is writing his PhD thesis on Regent Park housing project in Toronto and is a socialist activist in the United Food and Commercial Workers' Union.